 How to Write a Theme-Based Literary Essay. Think about the character's motivations, problems, and lessons learned and look for patterns. What does the character want, and what gets in the way?. How does the character want, and what gets in the way?. How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems? Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then Craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter: Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message Lawer caders with something a think about 	 Think about the character's motivations, problems, and lessons learned and look for patterns. What does the character want, and what gets in the way?. How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems? Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay , show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter learned and look for patterns. What does the character want, and what gets in the way? How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems? Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay , show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter: Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	 learned and look for patterns. What does the character want, and what gets in the way? How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems? Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the easay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay , show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	How to Write a Theme-Based Literary Essay
 How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems: Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then Craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a Universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter: Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	 How does the character try to resolve his problems? What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems: Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then Craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this? Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message
 What lessons does the character learn from trying to recolve his problems: Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yours the site and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems: Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this? Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay is show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yours the site isson you learned or realized The authorts message 	O What does the character want, and what gets in the way?
 Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons-what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a Universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authors message 	 Now what patterns can you see? Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Gtory-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	O How does the character try to resolve his problems?
 9 Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" 9 Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. 9 Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Gtory-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. 9 To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. 9 To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 9 Think about the patterns you see in Universal terms. Ask yourself, "What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" 9 Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. 9 Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. 9 To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. 9 To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	@ What lessons does the character learn from trying to resolve his problems:
 What big life lessons- what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authors message 	 What big life lessons-what themes - can readers draw from the patterns in the story?" Then craft a claim based on one of the themes. Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	Now what patterns can you see?
 Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 Search for the most compelling evidence that can support the claim, then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	"What big life lessons-what themes - can readers draw from the then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter. Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 then add it to the essay like this: Quote some parts of the text. Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter. Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	9 Then craft a claim based on one of the themes.
 Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message
 Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 Story-tell other parts. Summarize yet other parts. To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	· Quote some parts of the text.
 To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authors message 	 9 To write an introduction to your essay, start with a universal statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. 9 To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	· Story-tell other parts.
 statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself, focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim itself; focusing on the story you are writing about. To write a conclusion to your essay; show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	· Summarize yet other parts.
 To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	 D To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways: Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	statement about life and then transition to the text-based claim one of these ways: • Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter • Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized • The authorts message	one of these ways: • Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter • Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized • The author's message	itself, focusing on the story you are writing about.
 Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	 Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	D To write a conclusion to your essay, show connections in at least one of these ways:
 Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The author's message 	 Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized The authorts message 	· Your thesis and emphasize why the claim and evidence matter
The author's message	The authorts message	· Yourself and the life lesson you learned or realized
· Leave readers with something to think about	· Leave readers with something to think about	The authorts message
Letter Letter & returned to think a fact		· Leave readers with something to think about